A Joint Health & Safety Committee (JHSC) is a committee of at least two persons, who represent the workers and the employer at a workplace. Their primary role is to identify workplace health & safety problems and bring them to the attention of the employer.

Most workplaces with 20 or more workers are to have at least one worker and one management person serve as certified members of a workplace Joint Health and Safety Committee (JHSC). Workplaces with more than five but less than 20 workers are not usually required to have a JHSC. Instead, workers must select a person from among themselves to be a health and safety representative.

Benefits of Training:

- JHSC training will provide information on how to effectively support business operations upon returning to work.
- Ensure workplace health & safety best practices are implemented for your business.
